Use the search form to quick search for any game you are looking for. Search form Search form Customers such as Facebook users are making the biggest marketing investments, and companies may prefer to focus on those customers and avoid amassing a mass audience. Some marketers are also concerned about damaging their reputations with audiences on social networks and the consequent threat to their relationships with current customers. Related Summaries Companies like Kodak and Quidnet have already sued recipients of unwanted invoices from the company, claiming they violated the federal Telephone Consumer Protection Act. The Electronic Communications Privacy Act should also cover such unsolicited invoices, says Jennifer Davis, a partner at Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman. Facebook is offering advertisers access to its real-time data on customer and fan behavior in an attempt to improve the reach of the company's ad campaigns. The data can be especially helpful for targeting ads at the individual level, according to Matt Mendoza, the company's head of advertising. He expects the information to be critical for engaging the next generation of online shoppers, and for identifying times and places where consumers are most likely to "click" on ads. While the potential effects of social networking on the marketing department are still being debated, one thing is certain: it's not going away. Mark Fenske, president of the Digital Partnership, says marketers will be watching closely what happens to the mobile social networks. "Businesses are already tracking what you search for and what you click on," Fenske says. "If you post your name and address, you're exposed to more sales leads than you'd ever be able to find in a lifetime." A survey by the Association of National Advertisers suggests that U.S. marketers will spend around $10 billion on social media this year, up from $7 billion last year. The survey also suggested that "viral" marketing, in which an ad is shared and clicked on by consumers, will be the main driver of social spending, according to a report by eMarketer.
